

Respect and inferiority

Respect and inferiority are conditional

It is processed subjectively and objectively in the brain depending on the following circumstances

(1) Hierarchical relationships in society

① When judged by comparing years of service

② Mid-career recruitment

(2) Environments unrelated to oneself

③ Entertainment industry/specialized skill occupations

(3) Intimate relationship environment

④ Parents, siblings, and children

⑤ Couples/lovers

(Interpersonal emotions)

① · · · There is a possibility that some feelings of inferiority may arise, but there is a high degree of acceptability.

② · · · Compared to ①, the degree is considerably lower

* Transfer of skilled users/your own transfer

④ Even if you are in the same industry, it is a completely different field (the possibility is close to zero)

④ · · · High degree due to the relaxing space

However, this may be different for grandparents.

⑤ · · · In a sense, it is a third-party position, and it can also be seen as bragging, so the degree is reversed.

If I were to become a kindergarten teacher...

- ① Memorize all three basic articles of the Japanese Constitution by the time of graduation
- ② English conversation at a daily conversation level.
- ③ Basic PC skills.
- ④ Music (piano) playing and note reading.
- ⑤ Basic physical fitness and flexibility exercises.

It's a hellish weekday that children will remember, and they'll be exhausted when they get home, but by the age of five they'll be more knowledgeable and physically stronger than their parents.

In essence, you acquire all the knowledge a human can acquire in a lifetime in two years, but with no experience.

When the reversal of roles ① to ④ occurs, it goes beyond boasting about one's family and there is no sense of respect due to the reversal of positions, so the parent-child relationship is likely to collapse... Since they are deeply aware of the hierarchical relationships in society... if they do not express this internally, they will feel it even more...

(Note)

It's just a story for a novel, and there's no doubt that doing all of the above during a child's physical and mental development will cause them to feel disgusted and avoid the behavior, so it's perfectly natural...

*The word "superiority complex" is deliberately not used in this novel.