

Self-starting and self-contained

I've always been consistent in my belief that "if I don't do it, who will?"

and I do everything myself, right down to the very last thing (even taking out the trash).

A notable example of this is when it comes to money.

Because I have no one to rely on, I'm merciless towards anyone who gets in my way, and because I don't rely on anyone, no one can complain about what I do...

and everything I do is legal too.

Many people are probably thinking, "Are they really going to go this far?"

But there's still a feeling of dissatisfaction, as if they haven't used all their strength.

The work "For business managers considering reducing labor costs" is based on this philosophy.

If I had someone I could rely on, I wouldn't be who I am today...it's like turning a negative into a positive...

If there's a negative, a positive will come along...or something like that.

For managers looking to reduce personnel costs